in this unusual and important work three well known historians of ideas examine the diverse forms taken in nineteenth century britain by the aspiration to develop what was then known as a science of politics this aspiration encompassed a more extensive and ambitious range of concerns than is implied by the modern term political science in fact as this book demonstrates it remained the overarching category under which many nineteenth century thinkers grouped their attempts to achieve systematic understanding of man s common life as a result of both the over concentration on closed abstract systems of thought and the intrusion of concerns which pervade much writing in the history of political theory and of the social sciences these attempts have since been neglected or misrepresented by deliberately avoiding such approaches this book restores the subject to its centrality in the intellectual life and political culture of nineteenth century britain
